Happy Hour

By Lee Ann Roripaugh

I always forget the name,

delphinium,
even though it was the flower the hummingbirds loved best. They came in pairs—sleek, emerald-bright

heads, the clockwork machinery of their blurred wings thrumming swift, menacing engines.

They slipped their beaks.

as if they were swizzle sticks, deep into the blue throat of delphinium and sucked dry the nectar-

chilled hearts like goblets full of sweet, frozen daiquiri.

I liked to sit on the back porch in the evenings, watching them and eating Spanish peanuts, rolling

each nut between thumb and forefinger to rub away

the red salty skin like brittle tissue paper,

until the meat emerged gleaming, yellow like old ivory, smooth as polished bone.

And late August,

after exclamations of gold flowers, tiny

and bitter, the caragana trees let down their beans to ripen, dry, and rupture—at first there was the soft drum of popcorn, slick with oil, puttering somewhere in between seed, heat, and cloud.

Then sharp cracks like cap gun or diminutive fireworks, caragana peas catapulting skyward like pellet missiles.

Sometimes a meadowlark would lace the night air with its elaborate melody, rippling and sleek as a black satin ribbon. Sometimes there would be a falling star. And because this happened in Wyoming, and because this was my parents’ house, and because I’m never happy with anything,

at any time, I always wished that I was somewhere, anywhere else, but here.
