Kitchen Fable

By Eleanor Ross Taylor

The fork lived with the knife
   and found it hard — for years
   took nicks and scratches,
   not to mention cuts.

   She who took tedium by the ears:
   nonforthcoming pickles,
   defiant stretched-out lettuce,
   sauce-gooed particles.

   He who came down whack.
   His conversation, even, edged.

   Lying beside him in the drawer
   she formed a crazy patina.
   The seasons stacked — melons, succeeded by cured pork.

   He dulled; he was a dull knife,
   while she was, after all, a fork.

Notes:
This poem is part of a special section of Poetry magazine’s May issue

Source: Captive Voices (Louisiana State University Press, 2009)