The Spirit Is Too Blunt an Instrument

By Anne Stevenson

The spirit is too blunt an instrument to have made this baby.
Nothing so unskilful as human passions could have managed the intricate exacting particulars: the tiny blind bones with their manipulating tendons, the knee and the knucklebones, the resilient fine meshings of ganglia and vertebrae, the chain of the difficult spine.

Observe the distinct eyelashes and sharp crescent fingernails, the shell-like complexity of the ear, with its firm involutions concentric in miniature to minute ossicles. Imagine the infinitesimal capillaries, the flawless connections of the lungs, the invisible neural filaments through which the completed body already answers to the brain.

Then name any passion or sentiment possessed of the simplest accuracy.
No, no desire or affection could have done with practice what habit has done perfectly, indifferently, through the body’s ignorant precision.
It is left to the vagaries of the mind to invent love and despair and anxiety and their pain.

www.bloodaxebooks.com

Kingdom numerous times during the first half of her life. While she considers herself an American, Stevenson qualifies her status: “I belong to an America which no longer really exists.” Since 1962 she has lived mainly in the U.K., including Cambridge, Scotland, Oxford, and, most recently, North Wales and Durham. Intersections and borders are common emblems in Stevenson’s work, though the land on which they are drawn is often mutable or shrouded in mist.

See More By This Poet