Where the Wild Things Go

By D. Gilson

The night Max wore his wolf suit made him infamous, bred the child star never sent to bed. Middle school, Max started drinking. Not in my house; his mother begged, No, no, no, wild thing.
Max reminded her who bought this condo, who paid for her meds.
Freshman year, Max raved. Roared his terrible roar, rolled, and almost wound up in a warehouse dead.
Where, oh where, do the wild things go? To rehab in high school.
To college on residual book sales.
Max kept his head down. Laughed at drunken frat boys. Bro, let the wild rumpus start. Max said, No thanks, and volunteered for the Peace Corps instead. Two years in Kenya, one in Belarus, the president thought Max might be of some use. Max moved to Washington, appointed at the State Department a cultural attaché. One important day Max wore his wolf-gray suit, then drove home well past rush hour in a freak snow storm.
Max drove on the deserted beltway, thought it his throne. Yes, Max belted, this is where the wild things roam.

Source: Poetry (May 2017)

D. Gilson is an Assistant Professor of English at Texas Tech University. His essays, poetry, and scholarship explore the relationship between popular culture, literature, personal history, and sexuality.

See More By This Poet